Tournament play works much like cash game play, with just a couple of rules changes. Instead of cash, players use chips that have no monetary value in order to make their bets. As the tournament progresses, the cost of the blinds and antes rise, in order to force players to try and accumulate chips to maintain a reasonable stack to play with. If a player runs out of chips, they are eliminated from a tournament. Players win money in tournaments based on when they are eliminated. The final player with all of the chips at the end is the winner and will earn the largest prize; in addition, other players who make it to the late stages of the tournament normally win prizes, with the last 10% of players surviving usually winning some sort of prize money. Finally, one of the most important tips we can give to new players is to avoid the temptation to correct or berate your opponents. Not only could you potentially be educating a player who you will likely beat in the long run, but even worse, you might destroy the mood at your table. This could cause players to tighten up or even leave, which will definitely hurt your earning potential.
