In the early 20th century, gambling was outlawed in many States of the US. To get around the law they turned some slot machines into 'vendors'. Instead of awarding cash prizes, the vendor machines would give out items such as mints and chewing gum. As a result, it was not uncommon to see images of gum on the reels. These machines were also beautifully designed and fun to look at. Trade stimulator machines were similar to vendors and could be found in bars and drug stores. Ironically, their winnings were often paid out in cigarettes, cigars, trade or cash under the table. The symbols on trade stimulator machines were a little more serious, usually in the form of playing cards or roulette wheels. Still, they were stunningly designed and drew in the crowds, despite their low winning odds. Slot machine makers became even more creative in circumventing the law when they produced machines to look like pinball games and horse races but they were actually slots machines with the payout in a hidden drawer! These 'undercover' machines were also beautiful in their own right with handcrafted horse and pinball symbols. Designers weren't only creative with the design of the symbols. They also produced some very interesting show cases to house the slots reels, most curious were the cases in the form of human beings such as cowboys and showgirls. The slot machines would protrude from their chests! SlotsUp is the next generation gaming website with free casino games aimed to provide the review on all online slots.
