What I wrote about is not technically the biggest amount you could win, though it's the most you would win on a posted jackpot. If you received the 7 symbols on the payline, you'd receive 1800 coins. The 777 pays out at 200 coins for the 2-coin wager. The two extra star symbols would increase your payout by 9x, so you could walk away with eighteen hundred credits. That's a scenario you won't see talked about much, but it's actually the one you should be hoping for the most. But none of these techniques have been anywhere near as successful as the exploitation of biased roulette wheels. Finding the right wheel at the right time has helped many players over the years score big before the casinos who owned those wheels even knew what had happened. Best of all, these players weren't even cheating – they won their money fairly, and were allowed to keep every penny. Today, no Australian casino would use a wheel tilted towards certain numbers – but it doesn't hurt to know what to look for just in case the opportunity arises. Slots do tend to have a higher house edge than casino table games such as blackjack, baccarat or craps. The house edge is the advantage to the "house," or casino, that is built in to every game of chance it offers. Players as a group must lose at least slightly more than they win for the casino to make a profit and stay in business. While it's true that table games generally have a lower house edge, they are games that rely on skill and strategy, rather than pure luck, like slots. An inexperienced player or someone who's just having a rough night can lose much more with bad bets at a table game than any slots player.
