The merger will see the end of a long, drawn-out 14-month process that began with the merger being opposed by the Australian Competition and Consumer Commission (ACCC), as well as by James Packer's Crownbet. The two entities strongly objected to the deal after the Australian Competition Tribunal (ACT), gave their authorisation to go ahead. The proposal was initially announced in October 2016, but approval from the ACT was appealed by the ACCC, before eventually giving the green light in November 2017. ACT president Justice John Middleton ruled in November that the proposed merger would likely result in substantial public benefits and that the detriments pointed out by the ACCC would likely not arise or are not material. The tribunal was therefore satisfied that the merger would only result in positive benefits to the public and the acquisition should be allowed to proceed.
